What's the Problem?

- Consumers almost never record ownership information about their property (serial #, description, photograph...)
- When stolen or lost property is recovered, police have no idea who it belongs to; it's extremely difficult to return items to their owners without this information
- The FBI states only 2% of stolen property is recovered
- The number of stolen automobile has decreased; stolen property cases will increase to compensate for the loss of "income" for thieves

What's the Effect?

- Consumer almost never gets lost or stolen items back
- They spend hard-earned money for replacement of item
- Some “valuables” are irreplaceable (data on laptop, photographs in cameras, etc...)
- Consumer must file an insurance claim; insurance premiums rise; the deductible may not cover cost of item

What's the Effect?

- Thief is successful and is emboldened to strike again
- Lack of witness/consumer means potential unsuccessful prosecution of criminal
- Police evidence rooms are overflowing with unclaimed consumer goods
- Police waste time in researching owners of recovered goods, decreasing time for other crime fighting efforts

What's the Objective?

- Get the items back to their owners
- Reduce the number of insurance claims
- Reduce the amount of unclaimed property in Police and Sheriff's evidence rooms
- Identify the owner so a successful prosecution can take place
- Give Law Enforcement the ability to efficiently return recovered property and free up time for crime fighting

How can we do this?

- We need an easy method to register ownership information
- Has to be free or low cost
- Has to be user-friendly
- No contracts or commitments
- Has to be accessible to Law Enforcement anywhere and anytime
